A New Perspective on Identity Theft By Mark Pribish

While I knew identity (ID) theft could happen to me, I always believed that my odds of becoming a victim were small; after all, helping businesses and consumers protect themselves from ID theft is my business. When both my wife and I became victims of ID theft on three separate occasions in the last three years, however, I came to the conclusion that our personal information and the information of every consumer is not as secure as we may think.

Identity theft has become so lucrative that criminals are now focused on obtaining complete files of personal information from business like your current and former employers, colleges and universities, cell phone companies, and home and auto insurance companies. Criminals use both low tech and high tech means of stealing confidential employee and customer data that can negatively impact your credit, your job, your insurance, your tax return, your medical information and more.

From social engineering to computer hacking, every company is vulnerable to thieves who are intent on obtaining its stored information. According to the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, since February 15, 2005, the employee and customer information (along with social security numbers) of over 320 companies and organizations totaling 93 million individuals have been compromised. The breached data has been "lost or stolen" from some of the most well known, technology driven organizations including; Time Warner, Verizon Communications, General Electric, Bank of America, and Duke University.

So what can you do to protect yourself when even these large corporations are struggling to secure their information? The advice that I always give to my clients, friends, family and coworkers is to be proactive. Start today by increasing your awareness of the latest scams and trends, living a low risk lifestyle by properly securing and destroying your personal information, and most importantly, getting coverage for you and family. Just as you would purchase health club memberships to improve your physical health, you can now sign up for an ID Theft product and service being offered by a number of ID theft providers to protect your financial health and improve your recovery in the event your identity is stolen.

The more you learn about the risk of being a victim of identity theft and about the numerous ID theft companies offering an ID theft solution, the better decision you'll make when it comes time to choose right ID theft program for you and your family.
